A new fiber optic apparatus, the Light Scatter Analyzer, was used to characterize the scattering and absorption properties of samples of human dermal and subcutaneous tissue. The scattering and absorption parameters were obtained on different anatomical areas, and scatter values were correlated with the anatomical areas where the samples were taken. Differences in scattering characteristics were found between dermal and subcutaneous tissue. The scattering properties in fibrous tissues were found to be more complex than those in other types of biological tissues. The method described can be used to demonstrate the effect of new pharmacological treatments and new radiation modalities on the scattering properties of normal tissue.
