Using professional-quality batch processing, it is possible to achieve a certain degree of image correction even when you are processing low-quality, low-quality pictures. Such a tool will offer you several alternative ways to crop, resize and other functions. Once the device is connected, the program should be launched. Once it is set up, the user should click Start. A dialog box will appear, informing the user that the device is connected and asking whether he/she wants to start the batch processing process. From the main window, you can see the current picture being processed, and various tools. There are three large buttons in the left upper corner, which are extremely handy. The first one is labeled as a preview (image), and it will allow you to view the process as it unfolds. This will provide you with several statistical data pertaining to the picture in question, such as the ISO, the resolution, the color balance, as well as the amount of time that it has taken to process the picture. The next button is labeled as Stop, and it provides for the final image; that is, if the current processing job finishes successfully, the user will have the chance to pick the finished image, otherwise, he/she will be offered several options. There are three options, namely, continue, skip and stop. The continue button is a pretty straightforward one, as it will just finish the current process, but skip will just quit the current batch job. After choosing the desired option, the program will proceed with the image that the user wants to process. You will be given the chance to view the image, zoom in on it, crop it or redo the whole processing job. As you see, the process is straightforward, easy to understand, and is capable of a number of basic corrections. The interface is clear-cut and intuitive, meaning both power and novice users can find their way around it with great ease. It consists of a menu bar, several shortcut buttons and a large panel in which to view the uploaded image. There are a few formats supported, namely RAW, JPG, TIFF and BMP. Batch processing is available, yet it is important to keep in mind that pictures need to be of the same size. Items can be uploaded to the program, by using the appropriate button or the "drag and drop" function.
