The U.S. House of Representatives voted on Wednesday to repeal and replace a popular provision of the Affordable Care

Act (ACA), a bill that would repeal the law's individual mandate and replace it with a new tax on health insurance plans. While the idea was previously rejected in the Senate, the House could propose it as an amendment to the tax bill. Under the ACA, individuals with incomes over 200 percent of the federal poverty level were required to purchase health insurance or pay a penalty. The ACA also instituted taxes on big insurance companies to prevent them from charging high prices. While the law has resulted in increased enrollment, some insurance experts argue that it has also increased the costs of insurance, leaving the ACA's popularity low. Some economists have also argued that the law is a net loss for the economy, noting that the penalties incurred by people with out of pocket insurance costs have reduced the consumer demand for health care. Under the ACA, people with less than 50 percent of the federal poverty level are exempt from the individual mandate provision. Here are five things to know about the GOP plan to replace the individual mandate: The proposed law would allow insurers to charge 30 percent less for plans that cover preexisting conditions. Under the ACA, insurers could not charge older people more or charge women more than men. Under the Republican proposal, insurers could apply a thirty percent average discount to plans covering preexisting conditions. While the 30 percent discount would apply for the first three years, it would drop to 20 percent in the fourth year and would decrease by 04aeff104c
