National Geographic is now giving people access to exclusive pre-photoshoot images by subscriptions. You pay $1,500 per month, and get access to 7 days of high-quality images before any project. The process is very similar to how model portfolios work in photography — applicants present the images they'd like to work on, and the magazine can choose to feature the 100 best images. For those of us who pay $5,000 a year for Photoshop, the $4,600 RapidJet plugin is worth considering: it makes your biggest files as fast as the desktop version, and it permits simple access to the master image in multiple sizes without first opening that image in the desktop version. Plus you can save your Photoshop files as.psd rather than PSD, which makes them work in post production. But don't forget that on Windows and Mac you need a full copy of Photoshop to use the ClearType LQI feature, and that's what this plugin will cost you. PSD Gallery - A new, free update includes the ability to automatically attach metadata, watermark an image and/or title, and also lets you configure what files and directories are displayed in the gallery. You can also set up sorting so that an image's display order properly matches its file name. Finally, Photoshop has seen the update that's been coming for years and years. It's the iCloud integration that's making the update so important. You can now create a PSD, name the file and upload to the cloud, and Photoshop will grab new versions automatically and update the file from the cloud. Think about that. Just because you store a Photoshop file in a cloud, Photoshop version updates it.
