In a typical electric power distribution system, the electric energy is carried over conductors from a substation, through a transmission line, and to the customer. Generally, the power is transmitted at relatively low voltage, e.g., five thousand volts or less. For example, the power may be transmitted at three thousand volts, or three phase power transmitted at three thousand volts is carried over three conductor cables, each conductor cable carrying the three phases at a three thousand volt level. For larger utilities, where the power is transmitted at relatively high voltage, the voltage may be on the order of two hundred thousand volts or more. In both instances, the high voltage power must be stepped down to a voltage compatible with the customer load before the power is delivered to the customer. This may be accomplished by a line impedance, such as a transformer. If the customer load is larger than the impedance of the line, a step up transformer may be placed at the load. If the load is smaller than the line impedance, a line impedance, such as a bank of capacitors may be placed in parallel with the transmission line. FIG. 1 shows a schematic of a power system of the prior art. The high voltage power P is carried over conductors $L1$, $L2$, $L3$, and $L4$. The voltage of the power is stepped down by a line impedance Z . An input end of the line impedance Z is connected to a reference ground GND and an output end of the line impedance Z is
