The Quick Selection tool now has a toothbrush icon in the Layers panel when you select a group of layers. The tool allows you to brush off or move selected layers. You can also undo brush strokes that you don't intend to keep. (That's not true for unsupported layers.) As with any new feature in Photoshop, the Quick Selection tool does add a slight learning curve, but it's one that I'm glad I have. If, however, you end up creating brush strokes by accident, such as if you accidentally brush a highlight onto a selection that you didn't intend, you can brush them away using Undo and another new feature, Undo Previous Brushstroke (also new). The "Create a Web Link" dialog can be used for attaching an editable image to a web-hosted page or blog. The dialog allows you to specify the size of the image, link it to other files on your computer, and specify the size of the browser's window in which the image will be shown. The embedded file will contain the actual web page, HTML code, and CSS styles it will serve up. Adobe has added a new tool called Live Preset to the Smart Brush dialog. When Smart Brush is turned on, the brush you are painting with is automatically preset to the selected color. You can now also use drafts of different colors you have stored in the brush tool's Live Presets library. You can turn on/off the bitmap preview panel, if you want the brush to be Photoshop-compatible and not rasterized.
