When you look at the Sprint and iPad versions of Lightroom, the differences are clear. However, there is a price for this of course. The iPad version of Lightroom is about twice the price of the Sprint version. For the most part, they are nearly identical except for the user interface there. With the Sprint version, the displays on the iPad make browsing and the user interface look kind of old school. On the iPad, however, you have to zoom all the way in just to see the thumbnail of an image. It's not a problem, but when you want to see a 4:3 image at its native size, you have to rotate the iPad 90 degrees to get the upside-down screen top down view. They also look a bit different. The obvious one is that they render differently. The Sprint version has image search and markup, play to zoom in to that area, photo export, manage bookmarks, and as a side note, a slightly improved version of the original image-order of importing images. The iPad version only has the option to import images. The Sprint version of Lightroom comes with a brand-new SCAN mode, which I do enjoy using because it displays a ton more data about an image than just EXIF. The iPad version's SCAN mode is four times as fast and has no information about the image. If you ask me, the option to search for images using different filters is pretty important. Marking an image in SCAN mode as a favorite makes it easier to quickly find later when you are looking for something, especially if you have hundreds of images. Sometimes I still have the urge to tag some images whenever I use SCAN mode - though that's less essential than previously because they have added buttons to search for images.
