The micelle concentration of a surfactant in water can be determined from excess-solubility data either by direct determination of the critical micelle concentration (CMC) or by analysis of the data after suitable transformation. In this paper the authors have determined the CMCs of four representative nonionic surfactants, nonylphenol ethoxylates and nonylphenol nonethoxylates, by direct measurement of CMCs (where possible), or from concentration/wavelength-dependence of the excess free energy of micellization. The second method has been theoretically evaluated from an analysis of the excess-solubility equation with no adjustable parameters. It was found that the method can be used to accurately determine the CMC and the concentration and properties of the bulk solution of any nonionic surfactant in aqueous solution. The theoretical analysis presented here has a number of general advantages, and specifically it avoids the need to make any assumptions about the concentration of the micelles. It can readily be applied to any system that can be described by the excess-solubility equation.Q: ImportError: No module named win32api I am trying to import win32api in python with: from win32api import * This gives me the following error: ImportError: No module named win32api Is this something that cannot be solved or is my installation of python corrupt? This is the error I get in Spyder IDE A: I had exactly this problem when I wanted to learn PyQt. Actually, it seems that Spyder or IPython force the IDE to load not the system version, but its own version. Go to File -> Preferences -> Main Window
